Autumn: A tough act to follow

Last weekend, I was cutting and splitting firewood and I noticed the leaves of the maple and black gum trees starting to turn.

Scott Hill
Eastern Field
Director

It is hard to believe that another autumn is upon us, but there is a certain comfort that comes with the changing of the seasons. The color that causes a familiar anticipation of change that includes the foreshadowing of winter. Autumn is my favorite time of year and I am not sure why.

It may be the endless streams of waterfowl following the ice line south or fleeing the massive arctic

AEPP Grants will preserve 1,125 acres of farmland

Seven northern Ohio farms totaling 1,125 acres will be permanently preserved as a result of successful Clean Ohio Agricultural Easement Purchase Program applications filed with the state by the Land Conservancy.

The total includes four farms in Ashtabula and Geauga counties totaling 717 acres.

AEPP is a statewide initiative that preserves farmland through the purchase of permanent agricultural easements. It is administered by the Ohio Department of Agriculture, which selected 37 farms for funding this year from a total of 203 applications.

Douglas Perry, left, Scott Hill, Eastern Field Director for the Land Conservancy, and Keith Waris on the farm in Ashtabula County. The Perry and Waris farms were among those selected for AEPP funding.

The approved applications included:

- The 180-acre Geil farm in Ashtabula County's Hartsgrove Township. The property, located between two other tracts of protected farmland, is along Hoskins Creek in the Grand River watershed. Half of the land is forested, while the other half produces corn, beans and hay.

- The 103-acre Perry farm in Ashtabula County. The property is adjacent to 1,188 acres

Don't forget this 'right': preservation

When talking to landowners about their family lands, the discussion inevitably leads to the topic of "property rights."

Brett Rodstrom
Eastern Field
Director

Most landowners understand they have the right to build a house, a barn, or even a pond and can enjoy passive recreational rights such as hiking, hunting or just generally enjoying nature. They are keenly aware they have the ability to sell or lease certain rights such as farming, timbering and oil and gas exploration on any given piece of property.

What landowners often fail to see is that they have the right to preserve their property. See RIGHTS page 2

River watchdog's legacy is a job well done

In Northeast Ohio, no fewer than six streams – the Chagrin, Grand, Ashtabula and Upper Cuyahoga rivers and Conneaut and Little Beaver creeks – are designated as State Scenic Rivers. As one of Ohio's four regional scenic river managers, Steve Roloson helped protect those high-quality waterways. And doing so gave him tremendous satisfaction.

"I love rivers, and, to me, (permanent protection of those watersheds) is something very lasting and significant," Roloson said.

In August, Roloson, who worked closely with the Land Conservancy on a number of land-protection projects, retired after 32 years with the state, the last 18 as manager of the Scenic Rivers program in Northeast Ohio. He was recently honored by the Land Conservancy's Grand River Chapter for his work in protecting the region's rivers.

Even though Northeast Ohio has nearly half of the state's designated Scenic Rivers, the quality of local streams is not widely recognized. Roloson, who grew up in the Columbus area and worked in northwest Ohio before moving here in 1982, said the rivers here are exceptional.

"I never saw a clear stream until I came to Northeast Ohio. It was an eye-opener," he said.

Roloson worked with landowners, government officials, community groups and organizations such as the Land Conservancy to protect the wild and scenic rivers in this part of the state.

Since land features, such as floodplains, steep slopes, wetlands, riparian forest buffers and headwater tributaries play a role in protecting the health of a river corridor, it is important to purchase or permanently protect these key properties.

Roloson and his wife, Nancy, live in Rootstown Township in Portage County. Their son Michael, 18, is a freshman at Kent State University majoring in zoology and pre-veterinary medicine.

Roloson said he hopes to remain involved in conservation and "helping those people who love their land and want to protect it."

Rights

to realize, however, is that they also have the right to permanently protect their family land. This often overlooked opportunity is the single action a landowner can take to truly connect their great grandparents with their great grandchildren and share many of the lessons and experiences that often accompany these lands. Exercising this all important right essentially translates into passing on the ultimate family heirloom.

At the Land Conservancy, we strive to give landowners the unique opportunity to exercise their right to protect not only family lands, but also to strengthen their family heritage. We do this through a tool called a conservation easement, a voluntary agreement between the landowner and the Land Conservancy that legally protects land in perpetuity. While there are several potential tax advantages that accompany a conservation easement, the real benefit is to the family that strengthens its heritage by leaving behind a nature legacy.

It's inspiring to realize how one person's decision to exercise his or her individual property rights can have lasting repercussions for families and communities that will echo through generations to come.

RESTING RATTTLERS

Local naturalist Greg Lipps photographed these two Massasauga Rattlesnakes on Land Conservancy-protected property in Ashtabula County. Lipps says this was the third sighting of the endangered rattlesnakes in the Grand River lowlands over the summer.

cold fronts. Hunters love to see deep low pressure systems spilling out of Canada because they push thousands of ducks south. The waterfowl in front of these systems have included tundra swans and sand hill cranes. These experiences were not possible in our area 20 years ago. Today they are, thanks to habitat protection and restoration.

Maybe my fondness for fall is rooted in the trees that are rubbed by buck deer in an effort to free themselves from the itchy velvet on their antlers. Or the silhouette of a mature buck in a soybean field at dusk, with shreds of velvet hanging from his antlers. It could be the activity and engineering associated with a beaver colony. Then again, it may be the long, lonely sound of coyote howling. It is primal.

I realize that all of these experiences are timeless. We see pictures and read stories about these experiences from our forefathers, and for some reason they feel like a black and white picture. They shouldn't. The colors, the sounds, the smells – they are all exactly the same as they were before we colonized this continent. The work that we do at the Land Conservancy is critically important because we must preserve these experiences for generations to come. I want my grandchildren, who have not yet been born, to know what it is to hear swans at night or the howl of a coyote.

preserved through agricultural easements, the state's Shenango Wildlife Area, the Ashtabula Soil and Water Conservation District and Land Conservancy easements.

- The 284-acre Mildred Weedon farm in Geauga County's Parkman Township. This farm was purchased in 1926 but traces its history back to one of the first surveys of the Western Reserve.
- The 150-acre Waris farm, the northern anchor property for a corridor of protected land along Pymatuning Creek in Ashtabula County's Wayne Township.

Yoga on the Preserve

August 29, 2010

Orchard Hills Park, Chester Township

More than 450 people took part in the second Yoga on the Preserve at Orchard Hills Park. The event, which included a 75-minute yoga class and a guided nature hike, was cosponsored by Cleveland Yoga and the Land Conservancy.

The Land Conservancy would like to thank Cleveland Yoga, the Geauga Park District, Master Pizza, Pete McDonald, Patterson Fruit Farm, Marni Task and Enchanted Hearts for making the event such a big success.

Kids in the Creek

July 25, 2010, West Geauga Commons

The Land Conservancy's 12th annual Kids in the Creek event attracted about 75 children, parents and grandparents to the banks of the Chagrin River.

The popular family event helped reinforce the vital connection between children and their natural surroundings.

Our mission, our vision

Western Reserve Land Conservancy seeks to preserve the scenic beauty, rural character and natural resources of northern Ohio. We want to help create a network of interconnected natural areas, working land and green space throughout the region. We envision northern Ohio as a stunningly beautiful and healthy place to live, work and play.
